Market and portfolio review

Although the September quarter produced positive returns in Australian dollars for many markets, including Australia and the US, the underlying sentiment remained bearish as Central Banks globally continued to raise interest rates to address inflation printing at persistently high levels. Equity market returns in local currencies were much less flattering as the US dollar continued to strengthen against most other major currencies. Australian shares gained 0.5% including dividends over the quarter, although a 6.3% fall in the month of September dampened the mood as commodity prices fell and global recession fears increased. In local currency, US and European stocks both lost 5% while China and Honk Kong both fell more than 20% as Covid lockdowns weighed on economic growth, and further exacerbated with a weakening Chinese Yuan against the USD.

Future investment strategy

Market sentiment is still being dominated by the influence of short-term inflation data on Central Banks' future policy settings. The US third quarter reporting season will get underway in the next few weeks which should provide some insights into current the state of the US economy. Some of the recent company trading updates there, primarily in the Consumer Discretionary space, have suggested excess inventory and the need to de-stock following weaker than expected sales. This could be the first signs of the US economy slowing but, given the lag in the impact of higher interest rates on the economy, it will almost certainly be a few more months before we can draw any definitive conclusions about this, especially as the US employment situation remains robust.

While the market volatility caused by the focus on short-term macro data is likely to continue, where bad economic news is interpreted as good news for financial markets as it could temper further rate hikes, bad macro-economic news will still be bad news for corporate earnings. An improvement in the outlook for those earnings will ultimately be required for a more sustainable improvement in equity market returns, in our view.
