MARKET COMMENTARY

After taking a sharp downturn in September, markets came roaring back in October, posting their strongest one-month performance in 2021. The MSCI World Index was up 5.7%, and the MSCI AC World Index was up 5.1%. U.S. markets led the indexes higher while Japanese and emerging-market stocks caused a drag on index returns.

With markets performing strongly in October, it seemed that fears about COVID restrictions, economic growth, inflation, supply chain constraints, etc. had abated. However, it may be more likely that the markets are learning to live with these fears and that we are likely at peak pain. With PMIs remaining in expansionary territory, this may seem appropriate; however, there have been relatively few signs that supply chain issues have begun to subside, or inflation has begun to recede. Despite the sluggish GDP growth reported in the U.S. and China, it seems possible that once supply constraints ease, there will be sufficient demand to continue driving company earnings higher.

Looking at the indices on a sector basis, October was very narrow, as only four of the 11 sectors in the MSCI AC World Index outpaced the broader index while only three of the 11 sectors within the MSCI Emerging Market Index outpaced the broader index, a scenario that proved challenging for active management. Although the Energy and Financials sectors were among the four outperforming sectors, value stocks trailed their growth peers in the month, given the strength in this segment across the Information Technology, Consumer Discretionary, and Communications sectors (Google and Netflix).

As noted earlier, it would seem that in order to maintain confidence that markets will continue to touch ever-new highs, we will likely need to see a situation where economies can fully reopen, supply constraints recede, and inflation retreats a bit from its highs. Although caution is in order, as these risks wane and we continue to see good economic growth, we would expect markets to perform well with greater participation in that upward performance. This will not only bode well for active managers, but we would expect that value stocks will provide strength in this kind of market environment as well.

PORTFOLIO COMMENTARY

During the month, we reduced our exposure to the Utilities, Financials, and Communication Services sectors while increasing exposure to the Materials, Health Care, and Consumer Discretionary sectors. The more notable addition in the month was the purchase of Alibaba Group Holding Ltd. After a pull back of more than 50% from its all-time high, Alibaba now offers a compelling valuation entry point. At the current valuation level of less than 12x EV/EBIT for the core business, the market appears to not be giving Alibaba credit for strong growth opportunities within its other businesses such as Cloud.

As noted earlier, the portfolios did well in the Health Care sector as Anthem, Inc., Humana Inc., and Merck & Co., Inc. were the top contributors in October. Anthem and Humana performed well on the back of better-than-expected earnings despite extra costs associated with COVID. Further, the companies suggested that 2022 is expected to show strong EPS growth with general pricing discipline in the industry. Similarly, Merck's 3Q21 results were better than expected, and the company raised guidance for 2021. Management continues to highlight that its top-line growth potential appears under-appreciated by the market.

Altice USA, Inc. Class A detracted from performance in the month, fuelled by the company's announcement in the prior month that net subscriber adds were down for the third quarter. There is also a recognition that the company needs to accelerate its operating and capital investments to help its revenue growth prospects, which could weigh on earnings in the near term. Subsequent to month end, the company reported that the decline in subscriber adds was less than feared. Despite the shortfall in performance in Altice, we continue to see compelling valuations, with an avenue for strong upside in the next year, given the quality of the assets. Accordingly, we continue to own the shares but are closely monitoring the company fundamentals for any further deterioration. Seven & I Holdings Co. Ltd. underperformed during October in sympathy with the broader Japanese market. Additionally, COVID restrictions in Japan have continued to weigh on revenues and earnings. The company maintained its guidance, which we believe is very conservative, especially post re-opening within Japan and the consolidation of the Speedway acquisition. Accordingly, we continue to see a compelling risk/reward opportunity.

OUTLOOK

The strong market performance in October may allay some concerns that risks are abating in the market. With unemployment falling, PMIs remaining in expansionary levels, high level of savings, etc., we recognize that trends are going in the right direction but also recognize that risks still remain given higher and longer-than-expected inflation, high energy prices, supply chain constraints and, in some regions like the U.S., falling consumer confidence. We believe that as supply restraints ease and economies fully re-open, we should see a resumption of economic growth which has sputtered in the third quarter in some major regions like the U.S. and China. The portfolio continues to be skewed toward defensive-type holdings, which we believe is prudent in the current environment. However, we continue to look for areas of dislocations in the market and will look to profit from those opportunities accordingly.
